NRA Competitive Shooting is proud to present the "Club Champion Challenge," a new recreational shooting event for home town shooting clubs, businesses and civic organizations! The goal is to create an event that anyone can shoot, beginner to expert. These events are to be fun, relaxing and will encourage your club members to try a variety of disciplines and courses of fire.
What it is not is a high level competition using state of the art equipment.
Any club or organization can participate and any range can configure a challenge.
NRA membership is not a prerequisite!

A Good Year in NRA Competitions

By year's end, the NRA Competitive Shooting Division will have sanctioned more than 11,000 tournaments. This is a new record for our Division and I would like to thank all of the people who take on the responsibilities of running local matches, postal matches, leagues, regional tournaments, sectionals, and state championships. You are the life blood of the shooting sports and your hard work is very appreciated.

Along with all the sanctioned matches mentioned above, NRA also ran 51 National Indoor and Outdoor Championships in 2011. We had the pleasure of meeting thousands of shooters throughout the year and recognizing some of the best scores ever shot. NRA staff worked hard to streamline and automate the national records process and to ensure that championship and national records were kept current and that certificates were sent out in a timely manner. I know I signed more national records this year than ever before.

As we move into 2012, we look forward to another great year in all of our shooting disciplines. We are excited about our two new programs: the National Defense Match and the Club Champion Challenge.

Please contact me if you have any questions or suggestions at mkrei@nrahq.org or 703-267-1460. We look forward to seeing you again next year.

Best Regards and Merry Christmas!

ON THE COVER

For ninety years, George Farr's record-setting rifle has been a cherished keepsake among his family's estate. The Farr family recently donated the rifle and monocular to the National Firearms Museum where the two now rest quietly in the Camp Perry exhibit. Nearby is the silver Farr Trophy, named in honor of his accomplishments.

McGee Competition Stocks

Kansas-based McGee Competition Stocks grew from the high power shooting experiences of Steve and Shirley McGee. In 2010, Shirley set her third National Record; Steve has won two; both are Distinguished and both are on the U.S. Veterans team—Shirley being the first woman with that honor. As Steve tells the story, the stock business evolved from sending his laminated blanks out to be profiled and inletted by others, to believing he could do better by bringing the entire operation in house. The rest, as they say, is history. World class shooter Nancy Tompkins uses McGee stocks on all of her rifles for a common platform—from smallbore to Palma. Visit www.mcgeestocks.com/index.html.

U.S. Third in World Palma

Congratulations to the U.S. team for their third place showing at the 2011 Long Range World Championships in Brisbane, Australia. Top U.S. scorer John Whidden was third overall. The 2015 World Championships will be hosted by USA, tentatively at Camp Perry, OH.

World Steel Finals

Jessie Harrison swept all four titles at the Steel Challenge World Speed Shooting Championships in Piru, CA. for her third consecutive and fourth career women's title. SUCCESSFUL PISTOL SHOOTING BY BOB HICKEY AND ART SIEVERS

BY CHIP LOHMAN, MANAGING EDITOR

If you enjoyed military boot camp, you'll like this book. This is an updated version from what was originally published in 1996 and, while the earlier version perhaps earned a reputation for being abrasive and self-serving, this newer version attempts to add balance by acknowledging other coaching styles and philosophies. I said "acknowledge," not embrace. By their own admission, the authors state on page 21: "We have questioned the validity of the handgun information available in the public domain…" But a healthy debate flushes out unjustified methods and I found the general discussions well documented with credible results among the authors' team members who went on to succeed in competitive shooting.

Some statements in the book are simply incorrect, like the forward from a former teammate that states "NRA coaches and instructors are chastised if they vary, even minutely from the lesson plan." In fact, the NRA Instructor's Guide states that "Course content may vary based on the size of the class and experience of the instructor." Other self-serving comments simply fall into the category of "Our team was best." Did the authors take journalistic license to promote their teams? Perhaps, but it doesn't detract from the original thinking shared in this 661-page book.

If you can weather the blunt, "simple-is-better" philosophy of Hickey and Sievers, it is worth studying their cause-and-effect analysis. Many coaches believe "harder is better," advocating, for example, a very long hold to settle the sight picture. The Hickey/Sievers view, in contrast, is to tax the muscles less and complete the shot much sooner, resulting in less fatigue and unnecessary mental distraction. This is a technique advocated by many who's physical conditioning may not measure-up to a professional shooting team regimen.

From the Sioux City Journal: "Bob Hickey was an All-American shooter in college and a lifetime member of the National Rifle Association. He started the Junior Rifle program in Anchorage, AK and coached teams to many national and international championships including the gold medal three-position rifle champion at the Munich Olympics. Robert E. "Bob" Hickey, 69, of Tucson, AZ, passed away Oct. 30, 2003, following a lengthy illness."

Having served as a Marine First Sergeant, Navy Chief and later as a Navy Lieutenant Commander, Sievers was the Navy pistol coach in the 1960s, sending 25 midshipmen to All American status. A succinct coach, Sievers is not known for "beating around the bush." Go to this link to learn about the Art Sievers Air Pistol Team Trophy: www.nrahq.org/compete/nat-trophy/tro-112.pdf.

From Lones Wigger: "I knew Bob Hickey when he was a junior rifle coach in Alaska. He was also the intercollegiate national indoor champion one year, shooting a 299 3-position score which was unheard of at that time. I also knew Art Sievers very well. He was a very interesting and somewhat caustic guy, although I always got along with him well and liked him. He was very simplistic with pistol coaching. As I recall, he advocated align the sights and squeeze the trigger. That was all that was necessary to shoot the pistol well."

While the tone may be distracting for some, the content is worth the effort of sifting through the delivery. Having filtered through some of the chest-beating, I found the book provocative and worth reading, if for no other reason than it made me reconsider things I had taken for granted from the "public domain".

CLEANING WITH BORE PLUGS

If you recall our match barrel cleaning series (click here for the online archives), we concluded that the barrel "will tell you" when it has been adequately cleaned for optimum precision. Some barrels will shoot best when they are squeaky clean, while most prefer a little fouling before offering their best target performance. We also focused more on the throat than the bore. The other key point from our cleaning series was the introduction of new solvents that no longer use chlorine or salt, which must be neutralized to avoid etching the bore. This has changed some shooter's cleaning routine from "brute force" with a silicone bronze brush dipped in bore solvent, to "better living through chemistry" by soaking the bore first, followed by a bristle brush and patch.

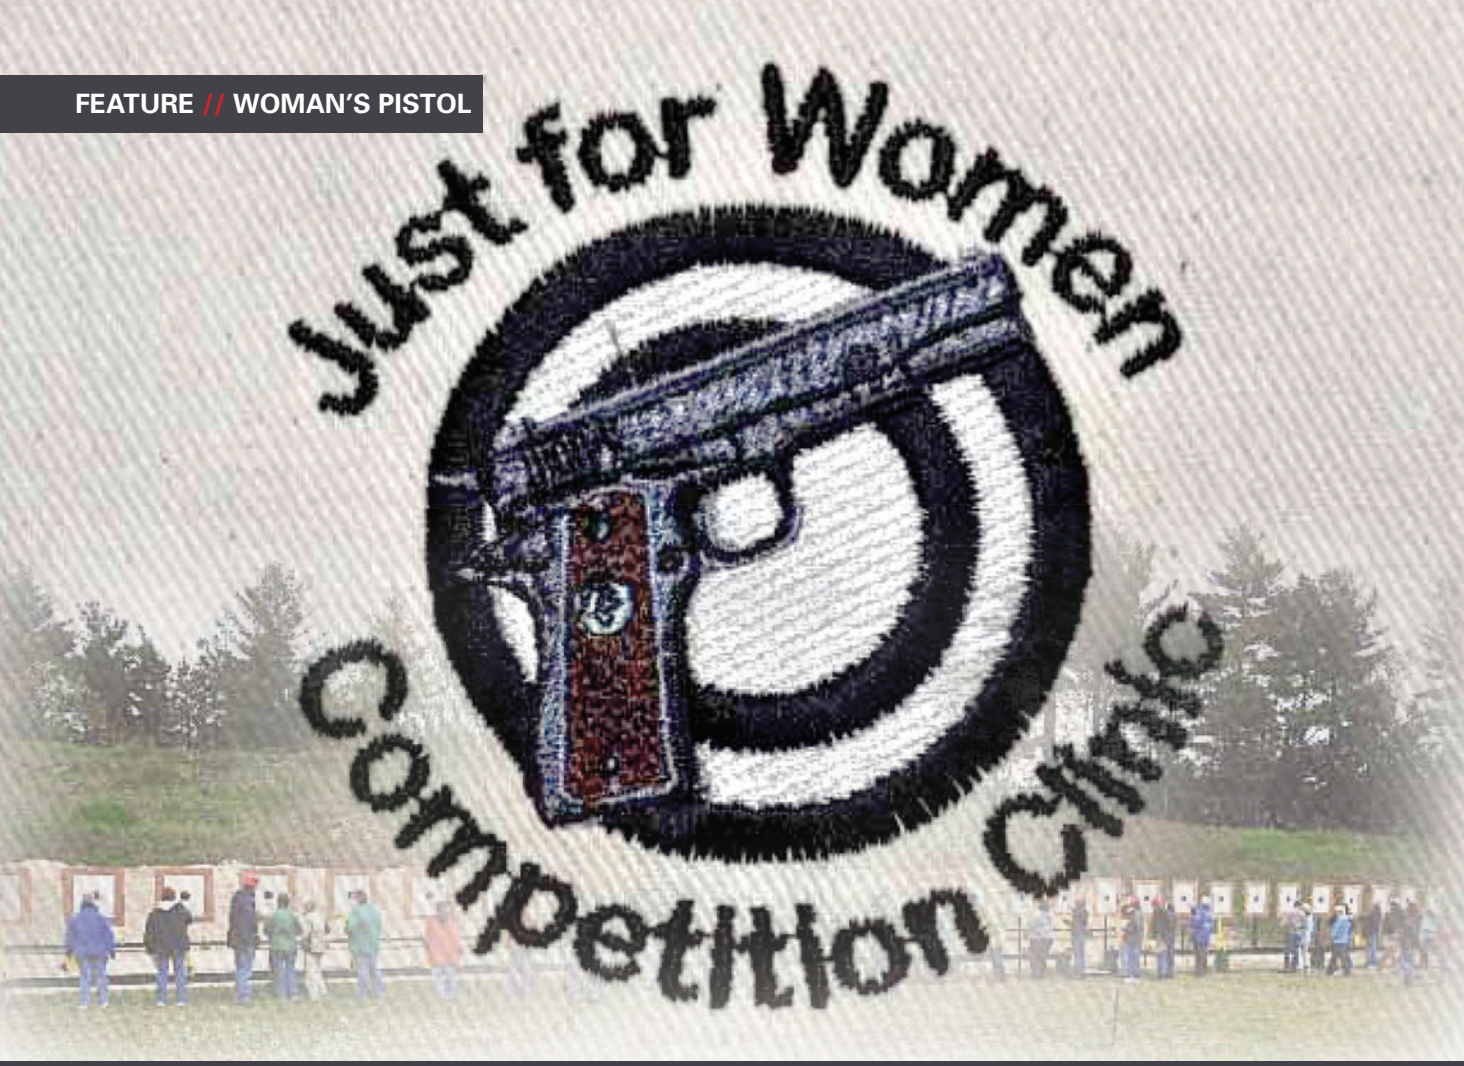

The Outers Company includes plugs in their advanced electrochemical bore cleaning system ($140) and offers replacement plugs for about $3.50 each. Whether you are overhauling a neglected gun or just want to start from scratch by getting down to the bare metal, bore plugs make it easy to soak the barrel bore with a non-etching solvent. There are foam and gel cleaners intended for the same purpose, but the percentage of solvent is somewhat less than soaking with pure solvent.

We asked a few manufacturers about the practice of saving the used solvent and learned that, in time, the potency of the recycled cleaner will diminish, depending on the amount of residue collected from the barrel. In our experience, the recycled solution remained relatively clear because we soaked the barrel after routine cleaning. See the three different sizes of plugs from MidwayUSA in Small (.22 cal.), Large (9mm) and X-Large (.45) at www.midwayusa.com/Find?userSearchQuery=outers+foul+out+bore+plug .

Just for Women Competition Clinic

BY DAVID E. PETZAL // PHOTOS BY BRUCE FLEMING

A local club in Scarborough, ME, helps grow our sport by making the classroom fit the student.

As any firearms instructor or coach can tell you, women shoot as well as men and are often easier to teach. So why aren't there more of them in the shooting sports? Because getting women and guns to mix in this day and age takes some special effort. [Editor's note: In our 2010 review of NRA classification data, 9.12% of competitive shooters were women.]

A prime example of how recruiting more women shooters can be done successfully was provided on May 14, 2011 at Scarborough Fish & Game Association (SF&GA) in Scarborough, ME. Incorporated in 1958, this NRA-affiliated club has grown to 177 acres with ranges for ATA trap, sporting clays, 5-stand, wobble trap, high power rifle, IDPA action pistol, bullseye pistol and archery. There are also 25-, 50-, and 100-yard utility ranges, all run and maintained by the 750-plus club members. See the club calendar at www.scarfg.org/twiki/bin/view/.

But back to the topic of recruiting women shooters. As anyone who shoots competitively knows, it's hard to break into a specialized sport without someone to coach you through the early stages. It's tough for men. For many women, it can be even tougher.

For this clinic, 30 of 52 firing points were used.

SF&GA has an excellent 52-point pistol range and no shortage of female and male members who know how to shoot bullseye pistol. But, the first challenge was how to attract 30 women for a competition pistol clinic. The club followed the golden rule of successful sales: Don't wait for them to buy, go out and sell it. This involved a concerted effort by two club members: Karen Lesniak, herself a new bullseye shooter, and Suzanne Hamilton who launched a public relations promotion that included:

- Publishing an illustrated tri-fold brochure of the 2011 pistol program.
- Personally handing out flyers at a local sporting goods store.
- Running a booth at Cabela's Ladies' Day and similar events.
- Announcements during regularly scheduled classes and on the club's website.
- Recruiting by the club's bullseye shooters. This was particularly successful, proving once again that there's no substitute for personal contact.

The women who showed up were from all walks of life, including health and business professionals, educators, housewives, students, and rescue squad volunteers. They came for all sorts of reasons, ranging from trying to figure out what their husbands/boyfriends were up to on the weekends, to overcoming a fear of guns, to looking for a shooting sport that was a little less punishing than trap or high power rifle.

The second rule we learned was: If you're going to give a clinic for women shooters, women should figure prominently as instructors. Lynn Heroux, the recording secretary of the club and an experienced instructor, gave basic instruction in pistol safety. Mary Goss, a nationally known competitive shooter from Connecticut, gave a talk on what it's like to be a woman in competitive pistol shooting.

Larry Carter is the go-to guy in New England for competition handgun gear, holder of national records, and a well-known face at Camp Perry. Larry supplied students and instructors with competition handguns to put everyone on the same level.

Lessons are learned more easily if beginners can help each other.

The morning was spent in the classroom and the afternoon on the range. Each shooter was paired with an instructor for the range exercise. After a 4-hour session on the range, those women who were attracted by the challenge were encouraged to join SF&GA's Thursday evening league. Since then, one student has already entered into serious competition.

All of them left with the knowledge that a target handgun is a competitive tool, like a tennis racquet or a golf club, albeit one that has to be handled with a lot more respect. Hopefully the group will help others understand that target shooting has nothing to do with crime and violence and everything to do with concentration and hand-eye coordination.

And that is a pretty good day's work for a gun club in southern Maine.

Smallbore Prone Regional

Fairfax Rod & Gun Club
Manassas, VA
Sep. 4-5 , 2010
Submitted by Paul Nordquist
27 Ccompetitors

The Labor Day weekend prone match tradition at Fairfax Rod & Gun Club goes back some 40 years The competition is always tight with some of the best smallbore prone shooters in the east in attendance. Last year proved no exception as David Cramer of Aliquippa, PA, wound up on top of the grand aggregate with a 3195-256X. Cramer has emerged as one of the most durable and versatile rifle marksmen in the nation: Intercollegiate All-American, twice National Indoor Four-Position Champion (1967, 1977), National Trophy Individual Match winner (1972) and twice Senior Prone National Champion at Camp Perry (2008, 2009).

Jim Cronin of Townsend, DE, was second with 3193-228X and Air Force shooter Mark Gould, Grasonville, MD, took the bronze with 3192-235X.

Jim Cronin's son, Patrick, was high Expert (3187-197X), Jim Krillich, Dameron, MD, was high Sharpshooter (3173-206X) and William DiSilvio, Fairfax, VA, was high Marksman with a 3150-140X.

Expert class shooter Nate Guernsey of Centreville, VA, didn't win the match but he just may have gone home with the best story. As the last metallic sight match began, his rifle's buttplate fell apart, rendering the rifle unusable. With great ingenuity he was able to effect a repair that got him through the day using----what else?---- duct tape. Still one more use for this versatile product. The next day, with butt plate restored to functionality, he completed the Regional course of fire compiling a very respectable 3184-205X.

It was a beautiful fall weekend in north-central North Carolina where 24 competitors lined up on Range 1 of the North Carolina National Guard Training site to vie for the top honor of N.C. State Bullseye Pistol Champion. The match's two-day format held the .22 caliber and Centerfire aggregates on Saturday, with the match concluding on Sunday morning by firing the .45 caliber aggregate.

Cecil Rhodes of Clayton, NC, came away with not only the overall win and the title of best Bullseye Pistol Shooter in North Carolina (with a trophy to prove it), but also won the prestigious North State Shooting Club "Hard Dog" award for the highest "X" count of 2622-121X.

The U.S. Coast Guard's Wes Fleming placed second and also took home the 1st Master trophy with a score of 2598-118X. In the closest competition of the match, Wesley Pierce edged Jerry Kittrell by one point to take the 1st Expert trophy with a 2524-79X. Eric Herrin of Raleigh, NC took 1st Sharpshooter honors and trophy, with William Harper of Hendersonville, NC, grabbing the trophy for 1st Marksman. The High Overall Woman and High Overall Junior shooters were a family affair with Rebecca Fellows and her son Bradley Fellows winning the trophies, respectively.

The prize table was stocked with shooting supplies and accessories from the match's sponsors, which included Springfield Armory, Dillon Precision, MidwayUSA, and Pete Hodges—Master Woodworker. All 24 shooters received a trip to the prize table in the order of their finish within their classifications. At the end of the awards ceremony, Springfield Armory gave away an XD45 pistol as a raffle prize.

A weekend of good fellowship and shooting was capped off just before the weather set in with a Distinguished Revolver and an EIC match. Mike Greno and Jerry Kittrell both earned points towards their Distinguished Revolver Badges and Eric Herrin took top points for the EIC match.

The 2011 schedule saw a format change with the entire 2700 on Saturday and introducing the "Iron Man" match on Sunday Morning before the Distinguished Revolver and EIC matches.

River Bend Gun Club's NRA Light Rifle Open Club Championship was fired on Saturday, October 2. The championship, the ideal weather and the fact that this was the final light rifle tournament of the 2010 season all contributed to record attendance for an RBGC light rifle match. The tournament drew a total of 28 competitors including 11 juniors, 9 seniors and 8 women.

The 60-shot NRA registered tournament was open to all competitors and there were no NRA or RBGC membership requirements. The course of fire was sixty shots in the standing position at 50 feet with an A32 target. This was an "any sight" tournament and either metallic or telescopic sights were permitted.

Scores were close as Don Coleman's 542 narrowly edged Mike Touchstone's 538 for the championship, while King Stracke's 531 was third overall. J. P. Hammond's 516 won him high junior and 2010 junior club champion.

This competition was open to any semi-auto military rifle in 6MM caliber or larger. The majority of the competitors were using U.S. service-issued M1's and M1A's with the exception of match director Randy Ent who used an AR10 in .308 caliber. There were 18 competitors shooting at the steel animal silhouette targets. The targets were set at the same distances, 200- to 500-meters, that are generally shot with scoped high-power rifles. Shooting them with the open sighted military rifles, off-hand, is a challenge.

The match winner and Pennsylvania State Champion was decided by a shoot-off between Greg Buss, Dowingtown, PA, and Brian Wakefield, Smethport, PA . Each had a score of 28 out of 80 hits and Greg Buss won the shoot-off to claim the championship.

Twelve-year-old Emily McGill, shooting an F-Class open 6 BR, broke four NRA records for the junior and women's 800-, 900- and 1000-yard and aggregate. This record was only held for one day when Ruth Chiappinelli took back her 800 and 900 aggregate records. McGill's 1000-yard 146-6X held on for the weekend.

Saturday had on-again, off-again rain and McGill got to shoot in both conditions. Only when it poured did we stop and wait for it to let up. McGill had no coaching on any shots for record. This is only her second competitive match she has shot in.

Steve Blackstone won the First Iron Sight award. Second and third Iron Sight went to Chuck Faingnaert and Tim Trunick, respectively, after a short sudden death shoot-off. Steve Maurer was First Master. A four-way shoot-off in AAA class for the first three awards between Bill Simmen, Mike Shamonsky and Jim Radcliffe was won by Simmen, followed by Shamonsky and Morgan. Rodney Barton won the AA class and Frank Cochran won the A/B combined class.

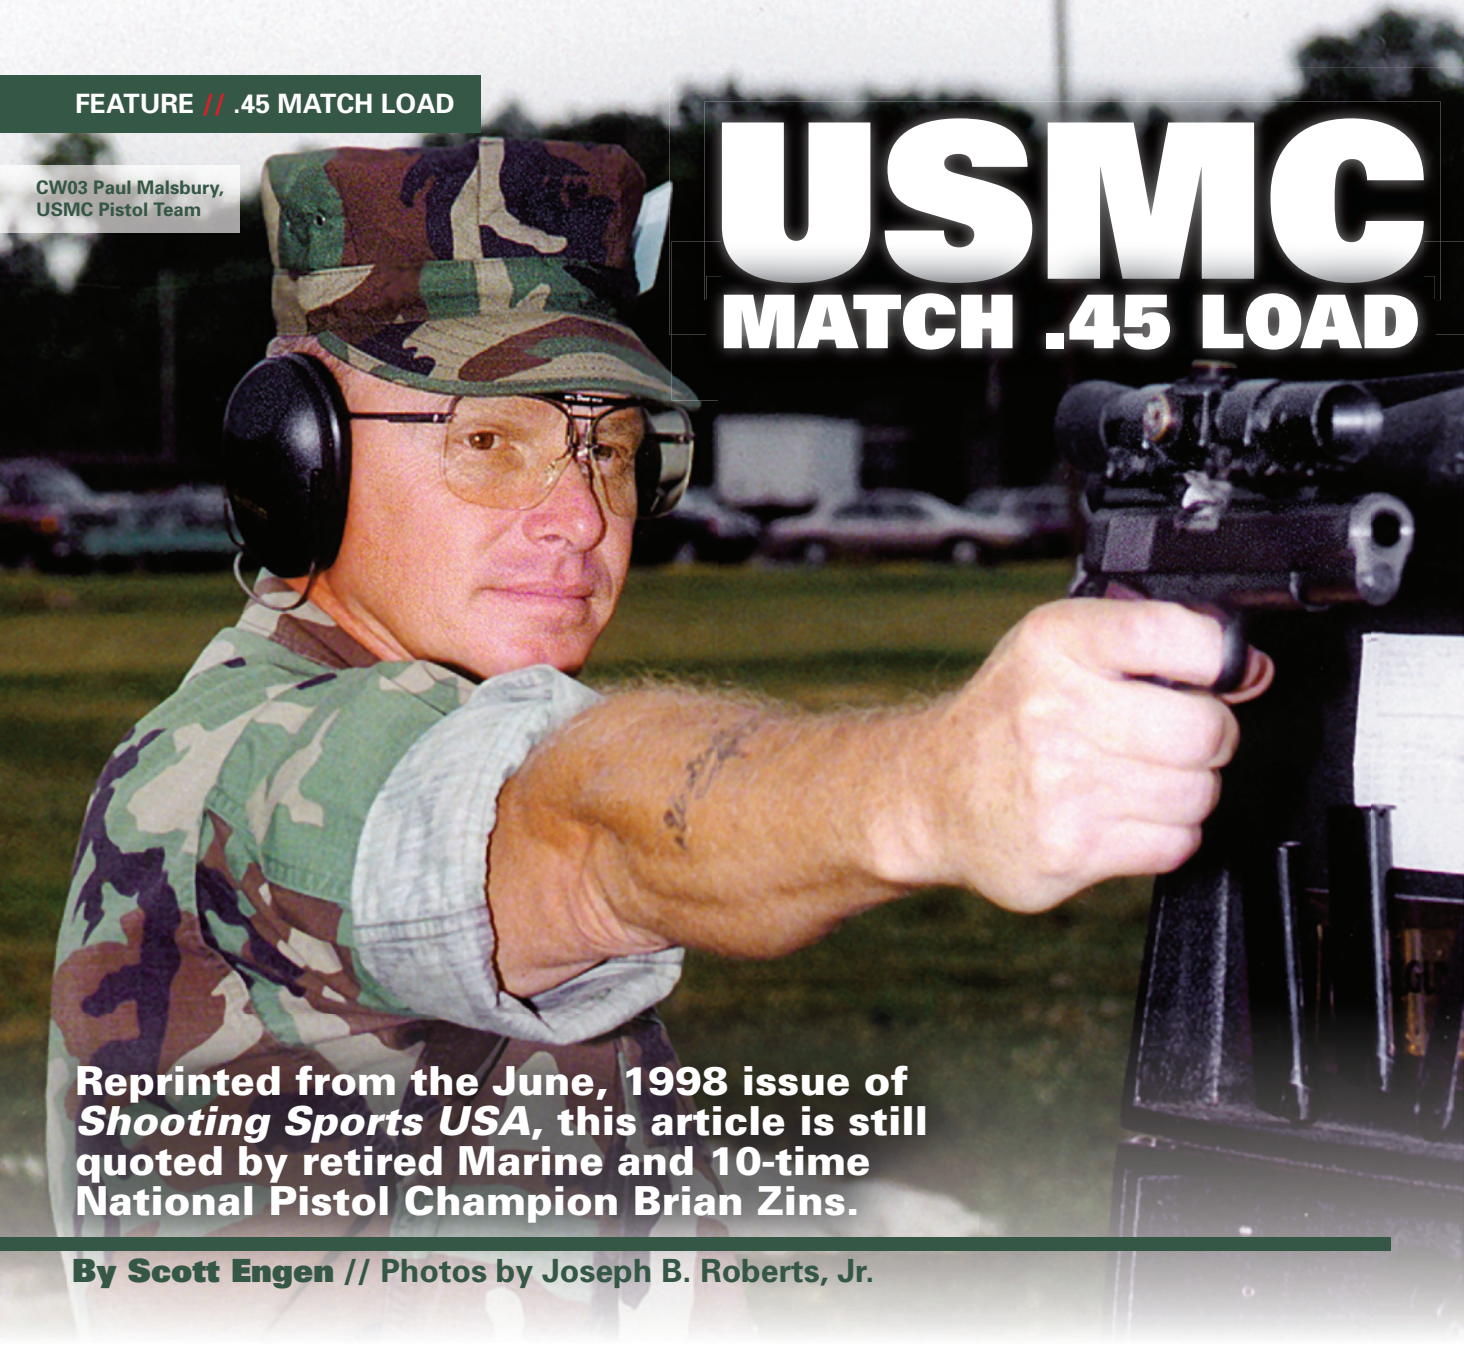

The Scope category was split into two groups using a modified Lewis system. John Haagen was first in Group #1 and John Powers won in Group #2. It is interesting to note that by using the period-correct type rifle scope (no internal or click adjustments and a ¾" tube), there doesn't appear to be a significant advantage over good iron sights as evident by the winning scores of Iron Sight winner Steve Blackstone and Scope winner John Haagen who both shot a 29/40.

USMC MATCH .45 LOAD

Reprinted from the June, 1998 issue of Shooting Sports USA, this article is still quoted by retired Marine and 10-time National Pistol Champion Brian Zins.

The wind blows. It rains cats, dogs and small livestock. The .45 ACP 1911 automatic pistol in your hand bucks like a half-crazed bronco on steroids. The aiming black of the 50-yard slow fire target dances through the shimmering mirage in your dot scope like Little Egypt. You're going to pull the trigger 270 times in this competition, and every shot is going to count for score.

That's NRA Conventional Pistol competition, sometimes called three-gun pistol or bullseye pistol, and for nearly a century it's been the most popular of the bullseye pistol events fired in this country. Civilian, military and police shooters alike are endlessly intrigued, challenged and frustrated by this shooting game. It puts every shooter and his or her equipment to a difficult test each time the range officer's whistle sounds and the targets turn.

Each NRA Conventional Pistol competitor is interested in squeezing every possible extra point and "X" out of their equipment and personal performance in the three-gun pistol events. Equipment is modified to suit the individual shooter and ammunition is carefully matched to each gun—all in hopes of shaving a few fractions of an inch off the average group size, giving the shooter a bit more margin for error and hopefully a better score in the process. Because the Centerfire and .45 Caliber stages of the NRA Conventional Pistol competition format make up two thirds of the potential match score, and because many if not most shooters shoot the same .45 ACP gun in both of these stages, the intrinsic accuracy of ammunition for the .45 ACP becomes of paramount importance. "Good" isn't good enough in the .45 ACP accuracy department.

USMC SHOOTERS

For much of the history of NRA Conventional Pistol competition, the service team that has set the pace for everyone else has worn the uniform of the United States Marine Corps. Over the past several years [Editor's note: This article was originally written in 1998.], the U.S. Marine Corps Pistol Team, headquartered at Quantico, VA, has undertaken extensive research and testing to develop a match-quality handload for the .45 ACP that has proven to be second to none in accuracy and reliability. Rumors and speculation about the actual make-up of this load, along with its accuracy potential, have been making the rounds of firing lines across the country since USMC Pistol Team members won their recent back-to-back National Individual Conventional Pistol Championships. This is the inside story of how that load was developed, and how you can build it at your own loading bench, just in time for your next big three-gun match or for Camp Perry.

HANDLOAD CONSISTENCY

Capt. Dan O'Connor, Officer in Charge of the team in 1996, had been receiving reports on the erratic accuracy of the factory match loads then supplied to the Marine shooters for their .45 ACP wadcutter match guns. One batch would shoot the center out of the X-ring at 50 yards all day long, while the next batch would open the group up to twice the size of that fired with the best ammo lots. During this time frame, USMC Pistol Team members also were engaged in their ongoing mission of conducting training clinics and firing schools for competitive shooters at matches across the country.

"The one constant thread in the comments of clinic and school participants nationwide was the belief that handloaded ammunition had the edge over factory match ammunition in the .45 ACP," said O'Connor. "This widely-held belief was based on the idea that the careful hand assembly of quality components was the key to intrinsic accuracy in match ammunition. I instructed our staff to do a cost/benefit analysis of the possibility of building a match-grade .45 ACP handload in-house that would help give the USMC Team an edge in competition."

DORMAN LOAD

O'Connor tasked team member Gunnery Sgt. Randall C. Lawless to investigate how such a load could be developed. During this research, Lawless recalled a sample .45 ACP load that had been shared with him at a match in Sommersville, WV, several years earlier by Al Dorman, a 2670-level shooter and former National Civilian and .45 Caliber Conventional Pistol Champion. Dorman had developed the .45 ACP match load using input from a number of sources, including several benchrest rifle shooters and from former USMC match pistol armorer Michael Curtis.

The Dorman load was put together on a Dillon progressive press using: New Winchester primed brass, trimmed to a consistent length; the relatively new Nosler 185 grain JHP; 4.1 grains of Vihtavuori N310 to a loaded cartridge overall length of 1.20". Dorman used only virgin Winchester primed cases for his long line (50 yards) loads, and once- or twice-fired WW cases with Winchester WLP (Winchester Large Pistol) primers on the short line (25 yards). Dorman noticed some clear differences in accuracy between the virgin and once-fired cases out of a machine rest as he was developing this load. Test accuracy initially was on the order of 1⅝" out of Dorman's guns at 50 yards from a machine rest. During informal tests at the West Virginia match, the Dorman load grouped well for the Marines, but didn't function well in their guns because of their heavier recoil spring rates. Dorman recommended a 14-pound spring in the five-inch 1911 with this load.

"I called Nosler and asked them about this bullet." said Dorman. "The Nosler people said the 185 JHP didn't start out as a match bullet, but they just got very lucky on this one in the accuracy department." The only downside to the Nosler 185 JHP load that Dorman was able to identify was the rounded nose of the hollow point cavity tends to cut a smaller hole in the target paper, usually about .32 to .38 cal.

Marine Corps shooters, using the .45 cal. accuracy loads, have been a dominant force on the firing line at Camp Perry.

"You have to be careful scoring this bullet and make sure both you and your scorer have a set of .45 cal. overlays, as a shot that looks well out may be touching or even breaking the next higher value scoring ring." Dorman observed. "This load does make for some interesting discussions when scoring."

Lawless thoroughly covered all the possible angles, investigating 37 different variations of the basic Dorman load with different charge weights, cases, primers and bullet seating depths. Extensive test lots of ammo were fired at 50 yards from several different Marine 1911 match guns mounted in Ransom machine rests. This exhaustive testing resulted in substantially similar accuracy results to those experienced by Dorman.

This handloaded match ammunition's velocity is reported by several sources to range from 770 f.p.s. up to 830 f.p.s. in a tight match barrel, with most competition guns shooting at the upper end of this velocity range. Ten-shot groups in the neighborhood of 1" center-to-center at 50 yards are the norm in the USMC match prepared 1911 pistols when fired out of a machine rest. Unlike Dorman's original accuracy tests, the once-fired Winchester cases using the WLP primer are also reported to produce levels of accuracy in the USMC guns that are nearly identical to those put together with new Winchester brass. The Marines' 1911 recoil spring rates range from 12 to 14 pounds depending on the individual gun and shooter. Recoil is reported by many to be softer than expected for a load producing these velocities. Marine match ammunition specialists handloaded approximately 58,000 rounds of .45 ACP match ammo for the USMC Pistol Team in 1997.

CAUTION URGED

Both Dorman and Lawless, along with the author, urge handloaders to use caution in the assembly of this ammunition (or any other handloaded ammunition, for that matter) as the relatively small powder charge weight and volume of N310 does not take up much space in the large .45 ACP case, and a double powder charge is possible if proper powder charging, handloading and quality control procedures are not carefully followed for each round during every loading session. Always visually verify that only a single charge of powder is in each case before seating the bullet.

Concerns over the potential of such a double charge, and its disastrous effect on both gun and shooter, may be the reason no loads for the .45 ACP using N310 appear in the latest January 1998 edition of the Vihtavuori loading manual. N310 loads using a jacketed 185-grain bullet for the .45 ACP cartridge are reported by Dorman to have been published in earlier editions of the Vihtavuori manuals. The author has verified that this load information exists in an earlier, undated Vihtavuori manual, although it lists a velocity of 919 f.p.s.

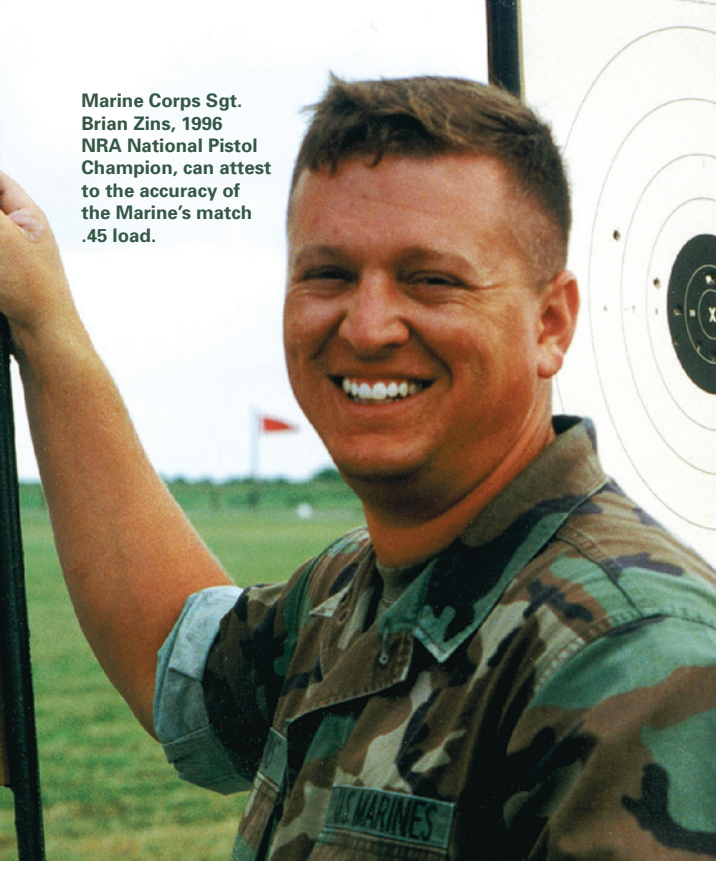

Although the reloaders interviewed reported excellent success and full safety with this load, those readers who elect to try this load data should follow all standard load development procedures, such as starting with powder charges reduced 10% from those listed as maximum, and work up to the indicated load slowly while monitoring for signs of excess pressure or other problems. The author did not personally handload, test fire or chronograph samples of this .45 ACP load during the research and preparation of this article.

JHP BULLET

According to both Dorman and Lawless, the Nosler 185 JHP bullet has shown itself to be more accurate than either a cast lead semi-wadcutter or a jacketed semi-wadcutter in the .45 ACP. O'Connor, Dorman and Lawless all indicate that this accuracy stems from the nature of the manufacture of the JHP bullet. "A jacketed hollow point bullet is built from the base out so the concentricity is true, unlike the full metal jacketed bullet which is built from the nose out," said Lawless.

"I just machine-rest tested 15 of our new 1911 match-prepared pistols," continued Lawless. "All but one fired 10-shot groups with 9 Xs or better at 50 yards, and that's with all nine or ten bullets being deep inside the X-ring. The one gun that didn't shoot up to snuff went back to the armorer for a rework."

Marine Corps Sgt. Brian Zins, 1996 NRA National Pistol Champion, can attest to the accuracy of the Marine's match .45 load.

Mike Harris, Nosler's director of customer satisfaction, affirmed that the 185 JHP is manufactured to Nosler's normal production standards. After the bullet tooling is set-up, test ammo samples built with several different loads are fired from a test barrel fitted to a fixed breech receiver to ensure that the tooling and set-up is correct. Only then is the set-up approved for a bullet production run. Harris declined to give specifics regarding the Nosler accuracy standards required for production run approval on the 185 JHP, but based on the demonstrated match accuracy of this bullet, it would be reasonable to assume they are very high indeed.

PROBLEM SMITHING

At this point, many readers may wonder about the feeding reliability of a jacketed hollow point bullet in a 1911 match pistol. Improved accuracy is all well and good, but if the points so gained are eaten up in alibi strings, it's all for naught. According to Lawless, feeding is not a problem in a properly throated 1911 match barrel. The few reliability problems that did become apparent during development were traced to the Winchester case having a bit larger rim diameter than the Federal match cases then in use. The breech face on the Marines' match 1911 slides was too small to allow the larger Winchester case rim to fully rise from the magazine, slip under the extractor hook and align with the barrel chamber properly as the slide went into battery. Opening the face of the slide to accommodate the larger case rim cured the problem.

"My own .45 match gun was the biggest reliability problem we had on the team," said Lawless. "Once we opened up the slide's breech face, it's been 100 percent. I haven't had a single misfeed all season."

O'Connor mentioned that Black Hills Ammunition has shown some interest in producing a similar match load for competition shooters, and has been producing exceptionally accurate ammunition for both rifle and pistol shooters for some years. According to O'Connor, Black Hills is also producing an excellent match load in 9mm Parabellum which has shown tremendous accuracy potential in the Beretta Model 92/M9 series pistols now being brought online for inter- service pistol matches. We can expect to see more of the Model 92/M9 series on firing lines in the future, as service armorers begin to turn more time and attention to building this series of pistols into match-capable firearms.

BARREL WORK

Lawless and O'Connor also gave credit to the quality of barrels provided by Bar-Sto Precision Machine out of Twentynine Palms, California. Lawless indicated that these USMC barrels were chambered to a depth of approximately .904", a bit beyond the SAAMI specs of .898". In his research, Lawless found the new Winchester brass was well short of this measurement, and in the future new lots of USMC barrels may be chambered to a depth in the neighborhood of .896" to .894". This helps create something of a short-throat barrel situation which can be very accurate with matching length cases, or can be lengthened if needed with a finish chamber reamer. Always check case length against chamber depth to avoid pinching a bullet in the case and creating a dangerous over-pressure situation.

Irv Stone of Bar-Sto Precision confirmed the special nature of the barrels they have been supplying to the USMC Pistol Team armorers for some 15 years. Each starts out life as a billet of 416 stainless steel, and is machined to USMC match specs, with a longer length barrel hood, a special depth on the first locking lug recess, and plenty of extra metal for the USMC match armorer to remove it.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Keep in mind that this article was written 13 years ago. While the load data is still relevant, minor facts such as Bar-Sto's relocation to Sturgis, SD, additional cartridges now being offered by Black Hills Ammunition, etc. should be noted.

It was 1921. Warren G. Harding was President; WWI was barely three years in the past and the Emergency Quota Act had recently been enacted limiting the number of immigrants admitted into the United States. On September 9 of that year, a 62-year-old man dressed in a khaki shirt and dungarees strode up to the firing line, rifle in hand. It was George Farr's first time at Camp Perry and perhaps things were not going as well as he would have liked. The 1903 Springfield service rifle he had drawn the day prior had problems holding its zero and now he was preparing to fire from the one thousand yard line with a replacement gun he had never shot before at that distance.

Fellow shooters on the line may also have wondered about this tall Washington State resident's choice of spotting scope. Farr had fashioned a crude monocular by cutting a pair of French opera glasses in half. But many of the other competitors were too tired to speculate. After all, it was 4:30 pm, the last relay of the day and the light was starting to fade.

Farr loaded his rifle with a clip of five rounds and began to fire. His choice of ammunition was government issue, loaded at Frankford Arsenal and fitted with tin-plated projectiles to limit barrel fouling. More experienced shooters on either side of Farr were using commercial Remington match ammunition like the master shooters of the day, including Marine Sgt. John Adkins, who had just won the Wimbledon Cup with this ammo. Farr's first sighting shot was high in the three ring and probably a few bystanders were surprised that this tyro, a man who shifted repeatedly in his prone firing position between shots, had even managed to get on paper.

sighter, followed by twenty rounds for record. With a sight adjustment in response to his first sighter, the next twenty-one shots had all been bullseyes. Being new to competition procedures, Farr gathered his equipment and prepared to depart the firing line. One of the range officers quickly stopped him and explained that match rules called for a shooter to continue firing until they missed the "black" (bullseye or 5 ring) of the target. Farr was happy to comply and to continue shooting, but first he would need more of his tin-plated ammunition, spurned by the other shooters. He patiently waited while more ammunition was retrieved. Time passed and the relentless sun dipped even lower.

A new supply of ammunition having been found, Farr began firing again in a race against the twilight. From time-to-time, he'd pause as his target was pulled for scoring, only to snap back into readiness as the carrier and target returned. The string of bullseyes continued with 30, 40, then 50, and now 60 consecutive 5s being carefully recorded on Farr's scorecard. A crowd had gathered, but the growing darkness made the difference. Farr's 71st shot for record went out of the black. Counting his second sighter, he had fired an incredible string of 71 consecutive bullseyes, all with government-issue ammunition and a rifle he had just picked out of an Army ordnance rack that day.

Admiring shooters surrounded George on all sides and it wasn't long before someone suggested that the rifle and its shooter deserved to stay together. A collection taken up from fellow competitors representing several state teams made it possible for Farr to purchase that rifle. A silver plate for the left side of the rifle was engraved to commemorate the event. But the story doesn't end there.

The next year, the Civilian Team Trophy was re-designated as the Farr

Custom Stocks for Soldiers?

THE United States Army is currently studying the problem of the combat rifleman and his effectiveness. At The Infantry Center, Fort Benning, Georgia, a Human Research unit under the technical supervision of George Washington University's Human Resources Research Office, is working with Infantry officers and men on the development of a training method for improving the fighting qualities of combat riflemen. The purpose of the project is three-fold: (1) To develop a training course which will prepare the soldier to use his rifle effectively in combat; (2) To evaluate current instruction techniques and determine how rifle marksmanship training can best be emphasized during basic training; (3) To ascertain whether or not alterations in the rifle itself have a critical effect upon rifle marksmanship instruction.

Is the 'tool' suitable?

One study preliminary to the main objective of this project was to measure the effect of 'fitted' stocks on rifle marksmanship. It was undertaken to determine whether or not the use of a rifle with a specially fitted stock would improve a soldier's ability to hit a target.

Custom-fitted stocks on guns are preferred by many sportsmen because they are more comfortable and they enable the user to shoot more accurately than do stocks of standard dimensions. For example, shotgunners who are active in trap and skeet shooting will not think of firing a 'race' with any gun that is not stocked to fit them.

Some military forces today issue rifles with stocks of various lengths to infantry soldiers. The Canadian army issues rifles of four different buttstock lengths to troops. The comb of a Canadian army rifle is stamped with a letter indicating the length of the buttstock: B for bantam, S for small, N for normal, and L for long. To determine which butt length best fits him, the Canadian soldier places the butt of a rifle against the upper arm at the elbow and grasps the rifle with his hand, putting the forefinger on the trigger. The rifle is considered to fit if the pad of the second joint of the forefinger rests on the trigger while the butt is held in the elbow joint.

How test was conducted

A class of 169 advanced non-commissioned officers at The Infantry School were 'guinea pigs'. First, these men fired a record course to determine their proficiency with M1 rifles fitted with standard stocks. Next the length of the forearm of each man was measured by the Canadian army method. Thirty-two men were found to require short stocks, which were made by trimming one inch from the standard 13-inch butt of the M1 stock. Twenty-three men required long stocks, which were made by adding to the butts of standard M1s the one-inch piece of wood which was cut from the stocks for the short men, thereby giving a butt length of 14 inches. One-hundred and fourteen men were issued standard unaltered M1s because their forearm lengths showed this to be the proper size for them.

Using the short, standard, and long stocks of 12, 13, and 14 inches, respectively, the 169 men were given 40 hours of instruction and practice. The time was utilized as follows: eight hours—initial record firing and stock fitting; four hours—mechanical training and functioning; four hours—sighting, aiming positions; two hours—sustained-fire exercise; two hours—trigger squeeze; four hours—zeroing and practice firing on the thousand-inch range; eight hours—zeroing and practice firing on known distance ranges; eight hours—practice record firing; eight hours—record firing.

In this experiment three important measurements were taken: (1) Each man's initial marksmanship efficiency, the record score fired with a standard stock rifle; (2) Each man's forearm length; (3) Each man's marksmanship proficiency after 40 hours of training with a fitted stock. Initial proficiency with standard stocks and the amount of improvement after training with fitted stocks for each group were as follows: short arm lengths, 147.1 to 183.6; medium arm lengths, 159.6 to 193.0; long arm lengths, 156.0 to 190.0.

Conclusions reached

What did these measurements show, upon conclusion of the experiment? That no significant improvement results from the use of fitted stocks. The three groups of men showed almost the same improvement after 40 hours of training with fitted stocks, as follows: short arm lengths, 36.5 points; medium arm lengths, 33.4 points; long arm lengths, 34.0 points. The groups using short stocks and long stocks did improve slightly more than the group using the medium length stocks, but the difference is not significant.

The Army learned from this study, in addition to the evaluation of the use of fitted stocks, the amount of marksmanship improvement which results from 40 hours of training. The average improvement of the 169 men was over 44 points, from 156.52 to 190.78, or an improvement from "unqualified" to "Sharpshooter" rating. The improvement of the 169 men is detailed in the table below.
